

On Tuesday, September 19, 2017 I attended a meeting in room 30. At the end of the meeting I offered everyone some of my beef jerky. I have been making a lot of Jerky lately. I am a part of a nonprofit that helps children affected by Cancer, recently we have been trying to team up with local ranchers and have them donate cuts of meat every month. The program is to be called My Meats for a Cause. We would take the meat from the ranchers and make the jerky. We would then have volunteers sell the jerky at farmers markets. The both would be able to promote local ranchers and our foundation. Our tag line would be Love Meat? Love Kids? Hate Cancer? Try our meat. So when [redacted] took me up on my offer to try the jerky I was simply looking for feedback on our jerky including taste, too spicy or not spicy enough and mouth feel, too dry or not dry enough. It was my fault that I did not make any of the clear when I was speaking to the group. After 1st I ran into Mr. [redacted] on the way to P.E. I again asked him what he thought about the jerky. We discussed that most of the beef jerky you find in the market today is wet or BBQ style.

In regards to me saying my balls are better, I was simply talking about the turkey meat balls I wanted to make for the baby shower. A few days before that I had talked to [redacted] about making the meat balls and pointing with the children's book "Cloudy with a Chance of Meatballs" I then said I could make anything she needed. A few days before the [redacted] I asked "Am I still making meatballs?" Mr. [redacted] said "no, Ms [redacted] is". That is when I made the comment. We then decided that I would make pigs in a blanket to go with the book Three Little Pigs.

Please forgive me for talking so long to get this in but I really wanted to understand how I can change the way I communicate with my coworkers. Sunday I spent some time with [redacted] and [redacted] from my church. We talked about the power of words and how it is on me to remove all doubt. To the intent of my words, I now have some 3x5 cards filled with some passages about the power of words and I plan on reading them every morning before work.
